from our collection

Athol Historical Society's museum houses hundreds of objects from the past, among them a varied collection of kitchen implements. Athol Historical Society's collection includes examples of the invention that gave L. S. Starrett his start, when he went door-to-door in his hometown of China, Maine, selling the hasher, shown here in two sizes: at left in a typical one-quart kitchen size and, near the kitchen grinder at right, in the mini salesman's sample size.

The Cuisinart of the 1870s with its crank and turning food receptacle, the hasher took the place of hand grinders and choppers near the salesman's sample to make kitchen slicing and dicing less a labor-intensive chore. L. S. Starrett located his world-renowned precision-tool factory in Athol after newsman Clarence Hill met Starrett on a train. Hill urged Starrett to settle in Athol. And, so, after due consideration, he did.
